Inking Error
"Albino"

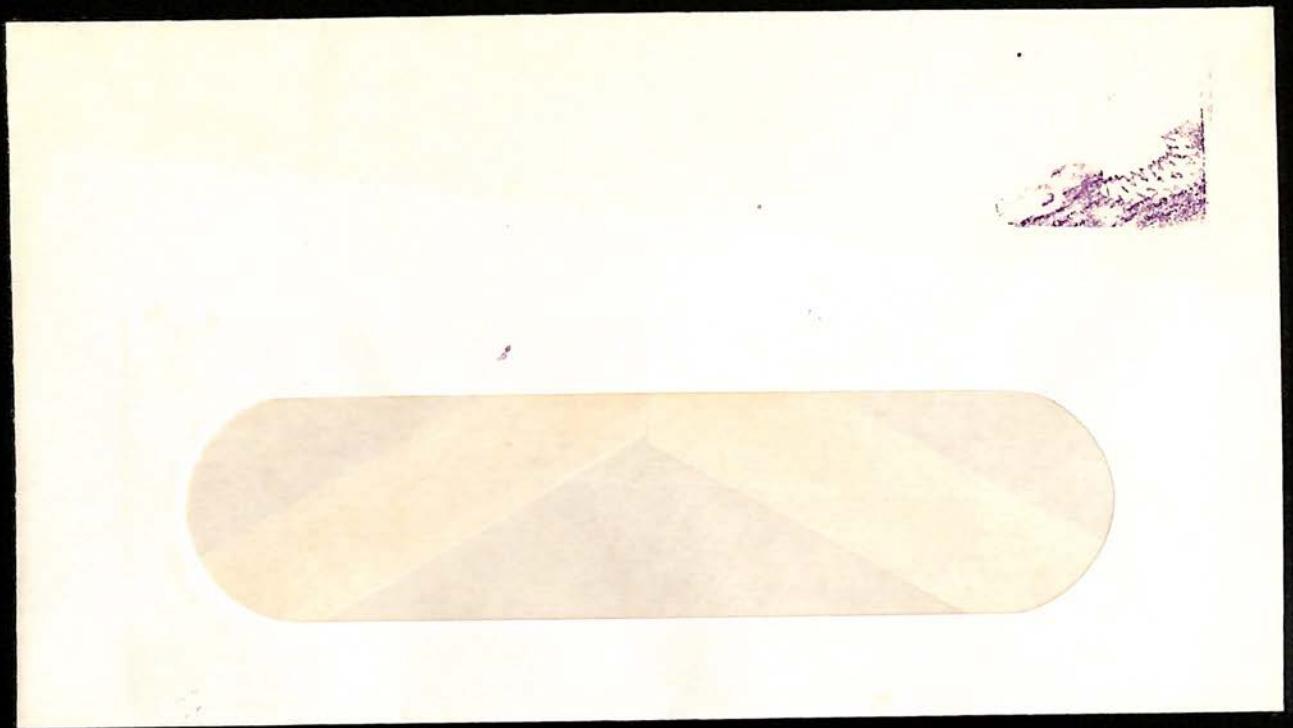

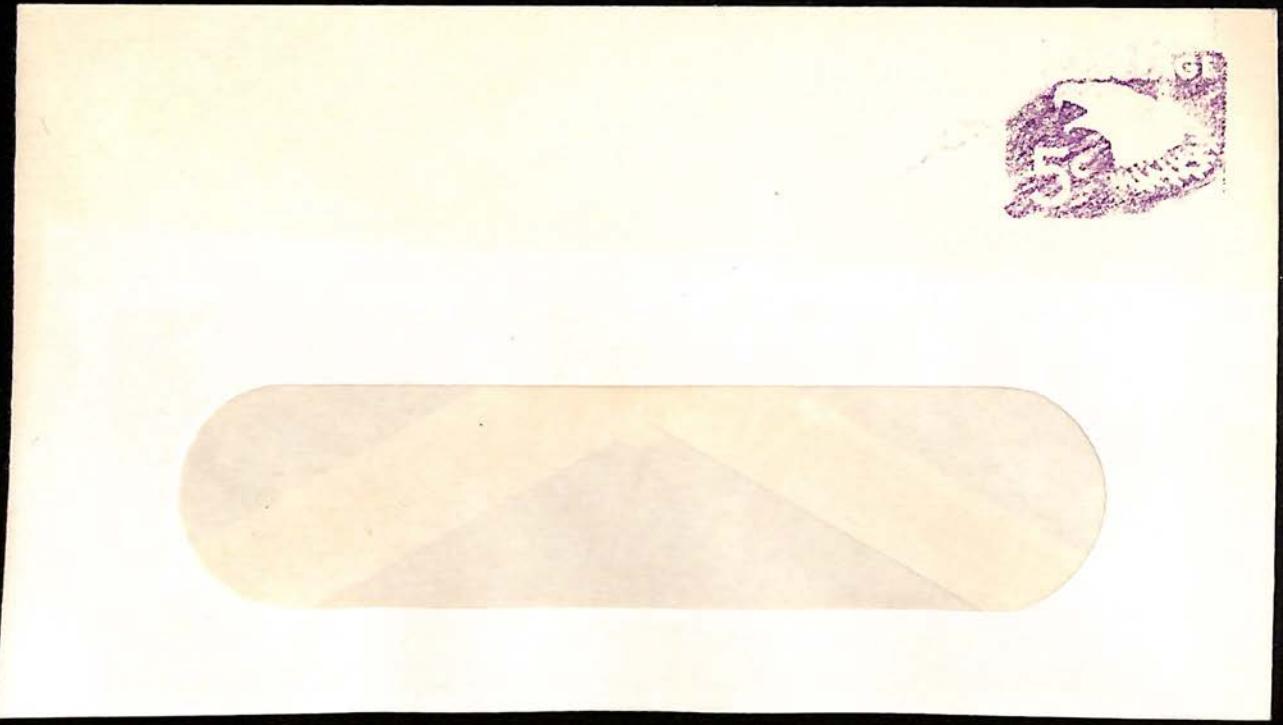

ENVELOPE FREAKS

During the early period there were few oddities among the envelopes, due to the slower hand processes used and the ability to inspect for defective items. With the advent of improved machines, some of which are fully automatic, there is little chance for inspection and everything is counted and boxed.

Stamps that are embossed but not inked are called "Albinos" and are the result of feeding two sheets of paper through the printing press at one time. Only the top sheet receives the printed impression, and if no one is watching when the sheets pass through a folding machine, the albino sheet is made into envelopes.

Another freak is inked inside the envelope as well as outside but the inner impression is little more than a smudge. This occurs when the press is allowed to close without a sheet of paper in place. The inked die prints on the counterpart pad and the next sheet of paper receives the impression on front and back. This smudge on the reverse will appear on succeeding sheets until the counterpart pad is clean.

If an automatic feeder misses a sheet and takes two the next time, the top sheet will be normal while the under sheet will be an albino with a smudge on the reverse.

Envelopes with perfect impressions inside are the result of feeding printed sheets to the envelope machine wrong face up, and those with stamps in incorrect locations occur when printed sheets are fed to a machine making a different size of envelopes.
