NATIONAL BASEBALL MUSEUM AND HALL OF FAME
The National Baseball Museum with its nationally celebrated Hall of Fame is a substantial fire-proof building designed especially for the purpose of housing the collection reflecting the history and development of the national game and the bronze plaques forming the gallery of the immortals within its walls. Selection of immortals have for the Hall of Fame are made annually and already seventeen have been elected for the honor of being represented by bronze plaques prominently upon the walls. These plaques have been provided by the National and American Leagues and form a valuable contribution.

DOUBLEDAY MAKES HISTORY
History usually makes generals. Major General Abner Doubleday was different - he made history. He made it on the battlefield and on the playing field. In the spring of 1839, he devised the baseball diamond and drew up a set of playing rules which blazed the trail to the exciting game which has become America's national pastime. Doubleday, West Point cadet and a stripling of twenty, traced the pattern of a baseball diamond on a field at Cooperstown, New York, in the spring of 1839, laid down a set of rules for a group of boys, and called the game baseball. Ball playing in itself probably could be traced back to the Garden of Eden. They tell of monkeys swinging at coconuts with the branches of trees, but when anyone asks where the Cradle of Sock was, the correct answer is Cooperstown.
