Postal From Vladivostok Had Roundabout Journey

The Addressed Side of a Postal Card from Vladivostok.

These two pictures traveled a long route. One is a portrait of Gen. Kuropatkin, taken from the back of a postal card. He is now hurrying over the trans-Siberian railroad to give the czar, his royal master, a personal account of the disasters that overtook him in the neighborhood of Mukden. The other picture is a reproduction of the face of the same card. It came all the way from Vladivostek, in Siberia, to A. A. Rutis, the Persian consul general, 1012 Keystone building, whose mother was in Vladivostock when the card was written.

At the time Mr. Rutis' mother wrote the postal card, on January 26, old style, orders had been issued by the military authorities compelling non-combatants to leave the city, and Mr. Rutis' mother was about to pack up her household goods and flit to a town a half-day's journey away.

It took about 10 days for the card to come from Vladivostok. Formerly letters from that port came to the United States via Japan and San Francisco in 21 days, but since the war began the route has been by the trans-Siberian railroad to St Petersburg, Paris and New York.

Mr. Rutis has a brother, who is a hetman of Cossacks, and a brother-in-law who is an officer on board the Retvizan, the Russian battleship.

Portrait of the once-popular Kuropatkin on the souvenir side of the card.
