EXPRESS MAIL

1983

This stamp, issued August 14, 1983, was principally for use on Express Mail Next Day Service, though it could be used for other mail as well. It was issued in booklet form in a pane of three stamps. The photo of the moon was taken by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in 1972.

The purpose of the USPS test of official stamps and stationery was to develop procedures for the possible future introduction of an Official Mail Stamp system which, when combined with meter postage, business replies, Express Mail, E-COM, and permit imprints, would provide total official mail accountability and the collection of proper postage revenue from official mail users. Bradbury Thompson created the design motif, and the stamps were printed in three colors on the intaglio press at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The set of thirteen stamps honoring the Overrun Nations of World War II was the first group of stamps in recent years to be produced outside the Bureau of Printing and Engraving in Washington. The job was handled by the American Bank Note Co. under contract with the Bureau. Each stamp features the flag of the Country honored in natural color. This issue had for its purpose the promise and encouragement of ultimate freedom from oppression by their continued internal underground resistance efforts in conjunction with our external strength of direct action against the common enemy.

Golden Spike Ceremony

The driving of the golden spike at Promontory, Utah, marked the inauguration of transcontinental railroad service. This stamp marks the seventy-fifth anniversary of this achievement.
